

Dear FCC,

Below you will find a copy of our email sent to "Fear Factor". Although the content deals more with the issue of cruelty to animals, the effect on children viewing the show only promotes more animal cruelty.

Fear Factor writer's et al,

This evenings Fear Factor was completely appalling. Although we are not viewers of "Fear Factor", while changing channels we noticed a man being attacked by a dog while trying to "steal" Christmas presents. The scene was absolutely disgusting. If you would like to humiliate people with their permission for your ratings, please by all means do so. You stoop to foul levels when involving animals, especially those that already have difficult reputations to overcome (such as mastiffs and pit bulls), in your ridiculous show. Enticing a dog to attack a human on national television is simply unacceptable and completely irresponsible. Period. Clearly, your writers have no dignity, nor does the host of your show and the people that participate. We realize that perhaps no more than one person may actually read this email, if one person actually does care enough to review your incoming mail. Hello to that singular person, your writers should be so very ashamed of themselves. Perhaps you should do something to bring the response of this atrocity to their attention. We hope this is not the only response to tonight's horrid display of animal exploitation. What's next... involving children?

Quite Sincerely,

Douglas and Georgia Delaney

PS - We wonder why the FCC is outraged by the split second sight of a woman's breast during last year's Super Bowl, but programs like tonight's Fear Factor will most likely not even register on their radar. What a shame.
